already see robotic couriers from Amazon on the streets . The company is testing them to automate the delivery of orders to customers. They are quite roomy, drive with an electric motor on six wheels and smile with the Amazon brand logo . But even robot couriers cannot, unfortunately, prevent parcels from being stolen from the door of the customer's house. And such thefts do not happen so rarely, and especially on holidays.

Therefore, a Brooklyn resident recently declared war on the "mailbox pirates" and even came up with a very simple device for this.

"Why leave your package on the porch? For thieves?" says Bob James, 59, creator of the Bob Box, a wooden box with a key lock. According to James, his invention is perfect for any front yard or apartment.

Despite an active advertising campaign, New Yorkers are in no hurry to line up for a novelty. James hasn't sold a single Bob yet

James was inspired to develop the Bob Box by a report that thieves were stealing about 90,000 packages a day in New York.

"Package pirates go out on a mass hunt, especially at this time of year," says James, admiring a painted demo version of Bob, which looks like a simple wooden box about 6 feet high (just under two meters) and weighs about 125 pounds (almost 57 kg). It can be chained to a fence or some other support.

"I'm not advertising this as a work of art. Its main advantage is functionality. Like a trash can, for example," says James. Most likely, buyers are scared off by the unsightly appearance of the "Bob" and the rather high price.

The main thing is functionality, not beauty, says James.

James wants to sell the Beans for $199, explaining that each one costs him $85-90 in materials (from Home Depot or Lowe's) and a day and a half of labor. James also uses acrylic latex paint.

As part of his advertising campaign, James even chained one of the crates to a streetlight near Borough Hall three weeks ago, The Brooklyn Paper reported. And thereby violated the administrative code of the city, so that "Bob" had to be moved soon.

James's ad says, "Shipping is free. Assembly is free. Ensure the safety of your parcels. Keep them
